This fan-fiction article, Hawmin, was written by Witcher190. Please do not edit this fiction without the writer's permission.

The hawmins, also known as follets or millets, are a race rumored to be the offspring of elves and gnomes, or half-elves and gnomes, and are particularly common in the regions of Ebbing, Geso and Maecht. However, their true origin seems to have been lost to time, leaving their lineage uncertain. A more plausible theory suggests they are related to gnomes, leprechauns, goblins, and griggs. Unlike these races, often considered savages or mischievous (except for gnomes), the follets stand out as one of the few other races, besides gnomes, dwarves, and halflings, that have been more or less fully integrated into human societies. With follets working as servants of human aristocracy and bourgeois or own their own.

Behavior

Hard-working and order-loving, follets are known for their meticulousness and dedication to their craft. They excel in tasks requiring precision and focus, making them invaluable tailors, jewelers, blacksmiths (although not better than gnomes and dwarves), and accountants. Their eyes can spot even the tiniest flaw, and their nimble fingers can manipulate delicate materials with dexterity.

Despite their love for order, follets possess a surprising streak of mischievousness. They might indulge from time to time in harmless pranks, rearranging a cluttered desk or hiding a misplaced object in a friend's pocket for example. This playfulness endears them to many humans, who see it as a refreshing contrast to the follets' usual seriousness.

Follets are meticulous in their movements and often reserved in their initial interactions. They speak concisely and choose their words carefully. However, they can be quite witty and enjoy stimulating conversation once they warm up to someone.

While content to work for humans, follets also harbor a strong sense of independence. Many establish their own businesses, becoming artisans or shopkeepers known for their quality goods and meticulous service. Their meticulous nature extends to their homes, which are models of tidiness and efficiency.

Characteristics

Follets have a average height between 3 to 4 feet tall. At first glance, they made be confused with gnomes, but unlike gnomes, follets forms and their facial features are very closely aligned with various of the human ideas of physical attractiveness. Something that in the regions where they are more common, have caused rumors of follets impregnating human women (specially in farming zones, near windmills) and viceversa. As well, the rumor of being the product of the union of gnomes and elves or half-elves. Which only fueled the hate towards them (however, less than with other races) They tend to rise above such prejudice through hard work and quiet dignity.

Follets are physically symmetrical, with short pointy-ears, close the half-elf average, and small eyes that come in a variety of colors, however, pale blue and pale violet are the most common.

Follets have a variety of hair colors, with brown, black, and blonde being most common. Their hair is typically fine and straight, sometimes with a wave, and they take great pride in keeping it neat.

Their skin is often pale, almost albino, which along their small eyes, had led many scholars to believed, that they emigrated from at least Kovir, previous to the humans appearance in the world to the south, where they joined the gnome communities much like gnomes joined dwarven communities later on in Mahakam. Which would explain their presence in Ebbing, Geso and Maecht due to the proximity with the Tir Tochair mountains.

They live longer than humans, but less than, elves and gnomes, around 280 - 300 years. A follet maturity is reach when they are reach around 26 years old.

Culture

All of the known follets are integrated in the cultures of their respective territories where they live. Few, if any of the ancient follets traditions survive. As their actual culture can be seen as a mix of the human culture of where they live, with traits of their original, gnomish and dwarven culture here and there.

Their clothing reflects their love of order. They favor clean lines, well-tailored garments made from quality fabrics, and practical accessories. Colors tend to be muted or jewel-toned.

Religion

They are very religious people, close to the few human priests that accept them. Many are followers of the Great Sun. However, at least in Ebbing, many are followers of the water god Pereplut and other gods of the Nordling Pantheon, which to the Nordling priests that accepted them have granted them the status of "honorary humans" due to the devotion they showed.

Magic

Like gnomes, the use of magic is uncommon, in their case due their religiosity, with many of the religions that they follow, prohibiting the use of magic among the common people. But unlike gnomes, is more usual. Like some gnomish burglars, they are able to use the invisibility spell, something common while doing their pranks. They are able as well, to use some spells based on air magic and able to do polymorphism, however this last form of magic is even more rare between them than the others since few follets have been able to study in a magical academy. Most of the follets known to use magic are priest's assistants or priests themselves. Which, although almost a impossibility due to their non-human status, have had occurred due to the already mentioned "honorary human" status that some priests have gave them.

Trivia

- One of their names (follet) derives from the Common Tongue word for crazy "foy'ek", as many early humans saw their intense love for order as a something crazy.
- They are based in one of the interpretations of the follet myth from Spanish mythology (Cataluña, Aragón, Valencia and Balearic Islands region) mixed with the havlins from the webcomic Alfie.
